ARTHUR TO THE EDITOR

Note: If my diary ever becomes famous, I should thank anyone who wishes to paragraph it in a manner pleasing to the eye and logical. I haven't the time when writing under pressure, nor do I wish to use up so much space on half-empty lines. [1936]

The point is this, should whoever edits my diaries after my death see fit to expunge the indelicate passages (and there are such in the life of each person who lives life at all zestfully), I should, were I a ghost, regard the one who took it upon himself to delete at his judgment as one who had cheated me. Having read Mr. Pepys and come to know him in some sort, I seriously doubt whether his spirit (a mundane one surely) would be grateful to you for your reticence on what he would consider the 'spiciest' moments of his career, though of course not the most important.

It seems to me that in all literature there exists no livelier medium for the recording of the spirit of an age than the day-to-day diary.
